

Alexandria Gazette.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 25.

A POETICAL PRISONER.—A tall, thin man with watery eyes and a thin mustache, was led to the bar in the Harlem Court recently. His long, blond hair was combed carefully behind his ears. The back of his head was encrusted with mud and his clothing was liberally plastered.

"How did you get so drunk?" Justice Wells asked him.

"I thought it no sin
To imbibe some gin.
But it was that rascally beer
That brought me here," answered the prisoner.

"Mixed your drinks, I see. You will have to be more careful in the future and not try to sample the entire stock of a saloon at one time," commented his Honor.

"I did not mix them; they mixed me,
And this rascally officer would not let me be," replied the prisoner.

"I do not want any trifling. This officer is paid for preventing such men as you from sleeping off their drinks in the public streets," said the magistrate.

"No wonder you feel somewhat irate
If you think I would trifle with a magistrate," the prisoner answered.

"Five dollars fine. Take him downstairs," said Justice Wells, somewhat indignantly.

"Ah, Judge, I pray,
A moment's delay
Ere the minions of the law bear me away.
Remit that fine and let me go;
My friends are waiting down below," begged the prisoner.

"Come, come! take him downstairs. His rhymes are enough to drive a man crazy," commanded the annoyed magistrate.

"Say, cully, have you got any tobacco about your clothes for a feller? I thought the long-haired poet would fool his nibs into thinking I was crazy or something, but I couldn't fool him worth a cent," the prisoner said to a big policeman who took him down stairs.—New York Evening Sun.
